

2020 Top HIV News Stories

A subject that didn't even have a name this time last year came to dominate the top HIV news stories of 2020.

If you'd been asked in December 2019 to predict POZ's top HIV news story of 2020, you'd probably guess incorrectly, even though the massive subject accounted for over 12 of the top 20 HIV news stories of 2020.

Topics such as HIV treatment and HIV cure research remained popular throughout the year, but the main headline grabber of 2020 didn't even have a name until February 11. That's when the World Health Organization announced COVID-19 as the name of the disease caused by the new coronavirus. On the same day, an international team of scientists said the virus would be called severe acute respiratory syndrome coronavirus 2, or SARS-CoV-2.

Within a few weeks of that February announcement, COVID-19 struck the United States hard, beginning with New York and Washington state, before spreading across the nation and taking nearly 350,000 lives by year's end.

As the scientific community grappled with understanding this new disease, people living with HIV wanted to know how it affected them—were they at higher risk of contracting it or experiencing worse symptoms? Such concerns led to our top HIV news story as well as updated items like this Ask POZ column from December and our July/August cover story, "COVID-19 and HIV: What You Need to Know." You can read a collection of all our related coverage by searching the hashtag #COVID-19.

The pandemic disrupted many aspects of our lives, including access to HIV care and treatment. In response to shutdowns and stay-at-home orders, many service providers turned to telehealth (and Zoom!), meaning the use of cell phones and computers to communicate with health care providers. The year's biggest HIV conferences, both nationally and globally, also pivoted to virtual formats.

As you can see from the top 20 list below, other HIV news did catch our readers' eyes—notably reports about HIV cure advances and remembrances of those we lost throughout the year.

Hmm...anyone want to guess what the top HIV news stories will be for 2021?
